

fishbowl

the only way out was through the tunnels. they seem to split infinitely, fractalling like twine unwinding in the wind. i choose one, knowing they all converge in the end.

into the tubular void, dark purple goo oozing from the walls. the viscousness sticks to my feet, clinging on with a purpose.
I continue running,
eternal search for the surface.

finally ahead, light spills out anxiously into the tunnel. and i'm reminded of twenty years from now, in my room alone. too uncomfortable to leave the door open, even when no one is home.

climbing out to the openness, the goo turns from purple to clear. the sun is out, but my soul still shivers in the cold. everything flooded, shin-deep water that has just stopped its flow.

barren, but one object peaks out only an inch above the water. the glass of a fishbowl, a fish inside, in perpetual isolation. darting frantically in a circle, forever trapped in liberation.