

staggering starlight

like the constellations of other planets my soul condensates into tears of a light that runs away from itself, i trickle down a sky of blackness into a sunken cavity, eroded solely for floundering i remember, walking in the park on a cloudy, frigid autumn afternoon, the type of cold that cuts at your insides and not out, when i witnessed, silently, the sap of a maple rolling down its rough bark, frozen a period feels wrong for a thing that never stops, but presses on my temple while i'm sleeping through the life of a person i no longer know, and there's an abscess there, under the skin of my skull where my self used to lay, intact